Easing sore muscles and aching joints and allowing the body to relax and release tension through the calming and soothing affects of hot mineral water has long drawn bathers to spa complexes the world over. Rotorua, in New Zealand's geothermal heartland, has a number of popular thermal bathing options. One of those highly favoured by locals and visitors alike is Waikite Valley Thermal Pools, 30 minutes south of the city off SH5. Set in rolling farmland, the complex features pure natural calcite-laden thermal waters minus the pungent sulphur smell often associated with Rotorua's thermal bathing. A licensed on-site café serving casual meals and snack food adds to the experience.
